

Natural Homosexuality

As a bisexual male my biggest struggle has been the idea that homosexuality is anatomically incorrect. With this essay I plan to show that gay and hetero sex are equally natural in different ways.

When I use the term unnatural I mean that it doesn't belong. When something doesn't belong in nature there is an organic solution to the unnatural occurrence. When a person receives an organ transplant, most of the time the immune system rejects the organ. It can tell that it doesn't belong and is a possible threat to the body. If homosexuality was scientifically unnatural then the body would reject it, similar to an organ transplant. (Immunosuppressive drugs allow the transplant to be accepted by stopping antibodies from rejecting it.) With gay people their bodies do not read gay sex as foreign or unnatural; biological messages are sent to and from our brains that gay is right. This can be seen through the sexual arousal process. The arousing stimuli runs through the brain and then brain sends messages throughout the body causing organs to be sensitive to touch and all culminates in sexually arousal and eventually climax. This is true for gay people and non-gay people alike. Biological sexual alertness is a sign that the body is going with what feels right. Sexual desire works very mysteriously and it varies from individual to individual. In some heterosexual relationships sex is viewed differently or carried out differently in all sorts of ways, whether it be oral, anal, or other creative creations, everyone also assigns their own meaning and feelings toward it. So not even heterosexuality means the same thing to every woman and man, so how can people expect homosexuality or heterosexuality to mean anything outside of an individual? We all have different experiences that shape our outlook about sex and relationships and we all are humans, eating food, drinking water, and made of human DNA. It is like we are all needing the same kind nutrition to live the human existence.

When I am in a gay relationship it is not like I morph into a mechanic cyborg made out of unearthly molecular structure. My blood is still natural, my skin is still natural so how can it be unnatural to exist with another natural human being? It is an anti-gay notion that homosexuality seem unnatural; gay is not unnatural in and of itself.

People tell me, "If you were to leave two gay men on a deserted island and return 50 years later they would never would have had children." I tell them, "I'm lucky then." They ask me why and I say, "Because 50 years ago I left two heterosexual men on an island and they populated the island like rabbits." Homosexuality never claimed to be the same as heterosexuality; they have their different rules and circumstances. When someone says, "But you both have the same sex organs." I say, "Exactly! We love it for that reason. That's what we have been trying to tell you for centuries."

Homosexuality never claimed to be able to reproduce, it proclaimed to be attracted to members of the same sex. It is natural for two men or two women not to have a child together. It is natural for homosexuals to have sex with members of the same sex.

I believe what has happened is a misuse of terminology and a flawed system of comparing. When people say that homosexuality is unnatural they mean that it is not a means for reproduction. Homosexuality never claimed to be able to reproduce, it claimed to be attracted to members of the same sex. If my body were to reject a gay relationship, similar to an organ transplant, then I could see how an unnatural occurrence is happening. Clearly this is not the case. If one believes that homosexuality is unnatural they are basing that off of a socially defined notion about heterosexual supremacy and the procreation that follows, remember procreation sometimes leads to homosexuality. Only if we measure homosexuality with homosexual standards and heterosexuality with heterosexual standards can we begin to see what is natural. Sexuality differs from individual to individual, and gay and non-gay sexualities are both natural in their own ways. If we look at what things are in their own right we will begin to decipher what are objective facts and what are subjective notions. So, my statement to the world is this, “I am a male (fact) I am attracted to males (fact) and it is natural (fact) because everything about my being is natural (fact), some people believe that my homosexuality is unnatural (notion).”
